The Accident Was Not Your Fault. The Claim Should Not Be Your Loss.

What happens in the days after a car accident can shape everything.
Here is what you need to know before you say a word to anyone.

A SCENARIO MOST PEOPLE KNOW

You are stopped at a red light. Someone rear-ends you. You feel shaken but think you are okay. You exchange information, file a police report, and drive home. By the next morning, an insurance adjuster has already called asking how you are feeling and whether you would like to resolve things quickly.

That call is not a courtesy. It is a strategy. Adjusters are trained to make early contact before you have seen a doctor, understood your injuries, or spoken with an attorney. The goal is to close the claim while your injuries are still invisible and your rights are still unexercised. A quick offer can feel like relief. Often, it is the opposite.

"Whiplash, soft tissue damage, and concussions frequently do not appear for 24 to 72 hours. Signing early closes the door on compensation you may genuinely need."

Georgia law gives you two years to file a personal injury claim, but waiting is not the answer either. Evidence disappears. The right move is to see a doctor immediately, say as little as possible to the insurer, and understand what your case is actually worth before making any decisions.

WITH US

At Flanagan Law, we build every case with trial in mind. When insurance companies know we are prepared to go to court, the conversation changes. And so do the numbers.

THE BOTTOM LINE

If you or someone you know has been in a car accident, do not give a recorded statement to an adjuster. Do not sign anything before speaking with an attorney. A quick settlement rarely reflects what your case is actually worth.

We are here to answer questions with no pressure and no obligation. If someone in your circle is dealing with this right now, feel free to pass this along. Referrals are always welcome and we will take good care of anyone you send our way.
